Heroic Nurse

Capt. Elizabeth Hay of Hampton, formerly Miss Elizabeth Hills of this town, was one of the eight nurses who performed so heroically at the battle of Brestonge, France, Jan. 3. She was on duty at a U. S. army evacuation hospital.

A dance had been planned for the Saturday night preceding the German break. The nurses were upset, at first, when officers who were invited from a nearby infantry division failed to show up, but as one of the nurses said, "A couple of hours later we found that we had been 'stood up' for good reason." They pledged to remain with the wounded as the Germans advanced, but were allowed only to assist in the removal of the men, and not a single patient was left behind. This hospital, at the tip of the spearhead, fell back with other hospitals on the bulge, only when forced to in those first six days of terrific action of the Nazi winter offensive.

The nurses, in mud-coated wooler shirts, slacks and GI boots, despite the moves, kept right on working.
